Financial planners and wealth managers help individuals plan their financial futures and help them make efficient and wise decisions regarding how to manage their money. Financial planners assess their client’s current financial position, learn about their needs and goals, and make recommendations on how to best achieve those goals. Some of the skills required for the field include communication, interpersonal skills, an entrepreneurial mindset, problem solving skills, and attention to detail. With these skills, you can excel further in your career and continue your growth in the financial services market.

One way to gain a competitive advantage is to earn a certification or license that increases your ability to conduct financial transactions that meet your client’s goals. Another way to advance your career is to specialize in specific financial areas such as estate planning, securities, or insurance. Specialization could require earning additional licenses or certificates and meeting specific requirements. For example, California State University, Fullerton offers the well regarded Certified Financial Planner program.

A career in financial planning can be both personally and financially rewarding. A good financial planner understands investments, taxes, estate planning and knows how to listen and guide their clients towards the best opportunities that will meet their needs.
