Management - Legal Studies

Major classes and electives give you the chance to delve into various legal aspects of business. By analyzing data and becoming familiar with the law, you learn to apply your legal knowledge to real-world situations. To get a more concentrated legal education, legal studies graduates can go to law school and earn a Juris Doctor (J.D.) degree.

A career in business law is one of the most financially rewarding careers. One potential career path is to become a business lawyer. A business thrives on the expertise of a business lawyer with regards to the legalities of running a business. The business lawyer is responsible for filling and reviewing legal documents, making contracts and business agreements, and reviewing business documents. A business lawyer provides legal counsel and represents the company in any legal processes. Before becoming a business lawyer one has to go through rigorous training and education but the fulfillment that comes with practicing business law is definitely worth it.

While graduates can continue their education to become attorneys, that is not the only career choice for an individual with a legal studies emphasis. Supportive specialists, business managers, financial experts and other industry professionals can also benefit from these programs and might not require any further education. However there are ways to specialize in a particular aspect for receiving certifications in areas you are interested in—please see the back of this sheet for more details.
